Utility Data for Health Technology Assessment
2-day course: Monday 7th and Tuesday 8th March 2016

Background
NICE and similar agencies around the world are using QALYs, hence the need for health state utility data in their assessments of the cost effectiveness of health care interventions. This raises questions about the measurement of health, the valuation of health and whose values to use. It creates additional challenges for meeting the requirements of a ‘reference case’ set of methods that may not be appropriate in all circumstances.

What does the course deliver?
This course outlines the practical requirements of measuring utility and obtaining utility data for health technology assessment for agencies such as NICE and explores recent research in utilities including EQ-5D-5L valuation, measuring subjective well-being and condition specific preference-based measures. It is delivered by a world leading team of experts in utility measurement.

Who will benefit from the course?
This course is for academics, Government agencies, pharmacoeconomics and outcomes experts in industry and consultancies with an interest in the use of health state utility data. Basic prior knowledge of Patient Reported Outcomes, QALYs and health technology assessment is required. For participants without this prior knowledge (or who would like a re-cap), a free on-line introductory course will be provided prior to starting the course which will take approximately 6 to 9 hours.

Course content
- What are the key issues in obtaining health state utility values?
- Does it matter which instruments are used?
- What is the current NICE reference case?
- When are EQ-5D and other generic measures not appropriate?
- What utility instruments are available for children?
- What are the latest development in EQ-5D including EQ-5D-5L valuation?
- What should be done when EQ-5D and other generics are not appropriate or not available?
- How can mapping be used to estimate utility values from disease specific measures?
- What are the implications of Value Based Assessment?
- What is the role of systematic reviews and meta-analyses of utility values?
- How should utility values be incorporated into cost effectiveness models?
