How Do People with Learning Disability Experience Sheffield City Centre?

Alex McClimens  Sheffield Hallam University
Michael Edyvean Sheffield City Council
Nick Partridge  Sheffield City Council
Ed Sexton  Sheffield City Council
The production of urban spaces reproduces social injustice (Fainstein 1996:26).
'Like virtually all social scientists, geographers have paid less attention to intellectual disability' (Park, Radford and Vickers 1998:222)
With respect to ‘not being allowed’ to engage in certain activities, this is probably a very real barrier in the lives of [people] with either a mild or a moderate degree of disability (Buttimer & Tierney 2005:33).
The steps up to the front door are not the only reason it's not possible to get into the ************.

(Low, 2001)
‘In a consumer society, a “normal life” is the life of consumers, preoccupied with making their choices among the panoply of publicly displayed opportunities for pleasurable sensations and lively experiences’ (Bauman 1998: 37).
'There are currently very few things an individual or group can do in an urban public space, without incurring at least disapproving looks, but often also formal warnings and fines' (Plyushteva, 2009:11).
rights, independence, choice, inclusion?

McClimens, A. Sexton, E. Partridge, N (2014) How Do People with Learning Disability Experience the City Centre? a Sheffield Case Study Health & Place (in press)
