Our Community: Archaeology In The City
Join us in opening up the discovery of the past to the public

We believe that archaeological insights and discoveries should be shared with our local communities and the wider world. You can help us achieve this.

From working alongside community volunteers on our departmental projects to helping local school children learn about their past, there are plenty of volunteer opportunities available.

In your second year, you’ll get a chance to put your archaeological skills to work in partnership with a local community heritage group, undertaking a research project for the Archaeology Matters module.

“Our Archaeology Matters project enabled us to work with historians, archaeologists and enthusiasts outside of the department, in addition to providing us with experience of coordinating, running and revising our own archaeological investigation. I have since been asked to take part in recording an audio guide put together by the youth theatre group we worked with.”
